PROCTOR KNOTT AT BIG SPRING.

The Great Statesmau's Appearance on the Scene Where he Began Lice as a Modest Schoolteacher.

Editor Breekenridge News: Big Spring, Kv., July 18.—This is a beautiful July day. I have come this fur to hear Kentucky's gifted statesman, Hon J. Proctor Knott. Some may think me quiteleager to hear a speech to have ridden thus for, but it was not solely for that I came. A ride through the morning air, you must admit, is quite refreshing to our tony and mind.

Starting at sunup, I was on the road two hours drinking in the cool fresh air, a lux ury rich indeed. Through the lonely wood nothing broke the solemn stillness save the songs of birds. The innumerable trees cast their soft shadows o'er me, and 'twas sweet to be there—ah! passing sweet. Here I would love to dwell amid these tills and valleys and list to the song birds in their joy, and the voice of murmuring waters. But I pass on. Probably you have some idea of the beautiful. Why Mr. Knott selected Big Spring as the place to address his friends in Breckenridge, I can not determine. It is not a large town. It is not a county-seat. It has no city hall to which to invite him and is one thousand hearers. It is a quaint little village, you know, situate twenty-five railes from river and railroad. It was once the home of Mr. Knott, however. Years ago he taught a country school here. Here also his father pursued for some time his trade of shoemaking. He taught school, too, occasionally, and was regarded as a man of considerable learning. Many here remember the family. Many of Proctor's old associates are here still, and remember the old days agone. Since then he has acquired great political eminence, but his relations toward these old associates are unchanged. He has the same big head, his face wears the same genial smile now as then. Consequently the people love him. All of these surroundings bear to him many fond memories.

But men do change, however. The place that knew Mr. Knott as the modest school teacher, sees him to-day risen to a great political benefactor; handling important issues, discussing great questions not affecting a particular class, but a whole multitude, an undivided commonwealth. During his public career this people have wa ched his record with no little anxiev. They have seen him acquire a fame which whatever it may be, they know is one of his own creation. They have great faith in his ability as a statesman. They re-spect and appland his great learning. This is proper. It is just. We judge men by their deeds of commission

Viewing Mr. Knott's acts during his twelve years in congress. I presume that no man's record will bear closer scrutiny. His aims were pured from the beginning. and he came out with clean hands. To-day he made no mention of his own public acts. His remarks were directed to the conduct of the republican party. He poured not shot into them from the start. He gave a detailed account of all of their acts of fraud and corruption within the last few years. He told his hearers how the leaders of this party had swelled their purses by filehings from the coffers of the government. He said a majority of them were dishonest, and that they had been in power so long they believed their robberies were legal—they considered that the United States belonged to them, that no other party had any right to interfere with the affairs of this government. In conclusion, he appealed to all democrats to stand by their colors. They could not be too confident as to results. He believed the coming contest in 1884 would be a bitter conflict. He believed it was time the democratic party should win. In this he voices truly the sentiment of a multitude. not only in Kentucky alone, but in the whole south and west. The masses are tired and sorely sick of republican dominaation in this country. They want relief, and must have it, from that system of class legislation fastened on the country by the republicans, a burden that will eventually ring the people and the country to ruin It is subversive of our best interests. There fore, it becomes every thoughtful man to cost his influence and his ballot against it.

Mr. J. B. Martin Sc., Clerk of Owes Co., Ky., says: "I used Brown's Iron Bitters for sever dyspepsia and it gave me great

The Wood machine, on Friday evening, while the grass was of a uniform height, did cut two respectable rounds; but Saturday morning, when it came to the knolls' where the wheat was light, it slabbered badly, so much so that its swath was bardly perceptible in those places. Then when it came to the basins, or heavy wheat, it was never able to get through with more than half a swath, when it got through at all. As to its making a nice bundle, I have been acquainted with the Wood binder ever since it has been on the market and that is the first time in all my life that I ever heard any one accuse it of making

If it excelled in a single point, it was not perceptible so much to the contrary that t never even got a place.

But I must say it fought manfully, and when death came it died hard. Exactly at 10 o'clock the Deering preached its funeral, while the St. Paul lead in prayer that it might have better luck in its next field trial. When we adjourned for dinner, it was pulled out to one side with the can vases off for the buzzards to roost on, so they would be convenient to strip the flesh from the bones of the next unfortunate team that was hitched to it.
